

(4)A desire to share feelings

2001-07-26 Thu

When a spirit appears from a person who is receiving Ki, and starts telling his stories, most of the time, he complains about pain, expresses his sorrow, his agony and etc. The Ki receiver is conscious while such a thing is happening; he wonders why he feels the pain, and sometimes starts having other negative symptoms rapidly. I assume that the spirits who appear want someone to know how painful they are feeling. Such negative-minded spirits are short of light. That is, they are in a total darkness and they can only perceive themselves. Even if there are other spirits who had a much harder time and are suffering, they cannot see or feel them. So they tend to think “Why am I the only one who has to suffer like this?” or “It’s only me who is suffering this much,” and get increasingly negative, all alone.

Such spirits want someone to know that they exist feeling pains, and sometimes they let their offspring or those related to them in some way who are feeling the same way as them, experience similar suffering such as sickness or hard experience.

When someone understands your pain you feel somewhat relieved, which all of us, the living, often experience in everyday life. When you share feelings with others, the vibrating energies of both sides resonate with each other, as if both of you are connected with a “line,” and a positive energy flows into you. But if the amount of the positive energy flowing in is not enough, then the other side becomes short of the energy, and eventually both sides will fall together.

Suppose a person who died feeling tightness in the chest appeared to one of his offspring with a view to let him understand the pain. And the offspring suffered the same chest pain, and learned the hard way how much his ancestor had suffered (in fact in most cases, it is unknown if the spirit is his ancestor or not). But if they keep on resonating with each other, the living body will lack the energy soon. This is when a High Genki apparatus should be used to charge your soul with Shinkiko energy from outside. And you need to share its power of light with a spirit and let him set off for the world of light.
